

What is malt paste?

Cats are very clean animals that spend a great deal of their awake time washing themselves, ie. they lick their legs and body. By doing this, they sink a lot of hair. The hair will most often pass the gastrointestinal system without problems, but it still happens that the hair lumps together and form a hairball. The problems arise when the hairball will not pass the gastrointestinal system. In nature, the cat will solve the problem by eating grass, as the grass induces vomiting and the hairball thus comes out of the system. However, many cats do not have the opportunity to eat grass when they need it, because they live in apartments in the city or because it is wintertime.

If you want to avoid vomiting and diarrhea caused by hairballs, then feed you Cat Malt on a regular basis. Malt tastes great and promotes peristalsis, that is, the bowel movements.

The malt paste helps to dislodge excess hair and send it on through the digestive tract. It does this through its natural laxative effect which helps to improve intestinal transit. This is why malt paste is also suitable for mild constipation issues. In short, malt paste helps cats to properly digest hairs and expel them without hindrance.

How do I give malt paste to my cat?

As you well know, each cat is a world onto itself. Some love malt paste, happy to eat it directly from the container and lick away at it indiscriminately. Others don't particularly like the stuff.

If the latter is the case, we can put a small amount on the cat's paw or corner of their mouth. They may not like it very much, but they will still try to lick it off, providing the same essential effect. You can also try mixing the malt paste in their food with the hope they will eat it without noticing. This is not always easy, especially with dry food. You may even have to chase your cat around the house to give it the malt paste, but it is something their guts will eventually thank you for.
